The faction of the mobile gadget tablet is still a little indefinite: it is a smartphone that does not really call, a netbook that does not close without a flip-open case. But the tablets are designed to appeal to the people who will take it everywhere, who tend to be the kind of people who do not want to waste a second, which, is a reason, are the kind of people who will load tablets with apps that promise Offer comfort. Software developers, for their part, tend to refer to this type of software as "productivity" and Android Market offers are no exception. The Android tablet app market may not grow rapidly as its fans are planned - starting from the beginning of July 2011, there were 232 specific apps for Android tablet for the options of 90,000 iPad options [Source: Pogue]. Since Android developers tend to favor the content on style, though, some of these offers provide significant advantages for the busy bees of Gingerbreadlead or honeycomb of the problem with the Android tablet applications and the discovery of the group jewels It is different versions of the Android operating system designed to run on different services carrier tablets, and consequently, many apps are not universal. For simplicity and, well, comfort, we focused on the discussion of the apps that are not limited to the specific devices of the producers. Read on to discover the apps of the Android tablet that could make life a little less complex. It is sure to say that tablet users are used to getting things delivered rather quickly. If the wifi connection is too slow, there is a potential for serious problems. (Dial-up days are, fortunately, forgotten long.) We have been conditioned to crops of instant gratification; The answers ready to e-mails and texts have become the norm. As for the normal old mail ... Well, we still need a way to deliver Netflix. So what's the agreement with Tanks? The concept is innovative, but the final result looks almost characteristic - take a picture with the tablet, load it and add a message and the service turns it into a postcard, delivered to the recipient of your choice. The app is a free download and postcards cost $ 1.49 to its head in the United States (it is also available in other countries and costs vary). Although the touch claims an estimated delivery times up to four days, users say that it is often much longer and the production and delivery of the postcard can actually take a couple of weeks [source: Android market]. The consequent wages are the clipper, though, and even if the tennis sacrifices a bit of his convenience factor, it's still a nice idea. It is a little more careful than an e-mail or an e-mail or text, and much more personal (and sincere) than to load that same image to Facebook with a "Wish you'era" caption ". PocketCloud Pro is among the most voted remote desktop apps for the Android tablet, and users indicate that it is quite convenient with regard to the tablet apps. So, what is a remote desktop app and why a tablet user may need it? After all, shouldn't a tablet provide most of what you need, most of the time? Well, yes, but this app fills the gaps for those who simply cannot, but they must, leave the main computer back and the usual data transport methods are not sufficient. In simple terms, PocketCloud Pro transforms the Android tablet into a portal to complete access to a computer from another.Developer Wyse Technology Inc is really targeted to corporate users, so some of the features of this app could be a bit ' Extreme for a casual consumer. So PocketCloud Pro loses points The price tag of $ 14.99 (at least compared to the rest of our list), is redeemed by its safety features, including a cryptographic system designed to safeguard the highly sensitive company data. PocketCloud Pro also claims that users can rely on rapid and reliable connections to their servers and an easy installation process. Since the dawn of web-enabled phones, it has become much easier to surf the urban landscape, both either Travel away from home or fade a path around your grassy carpet. But even so, it still takes a long time to say, decide on a restaurant. Pull up a site to check the menu, another to check the reviews, a third for bookings ... and, oh, no tables are free ... or worse, you just get to find out that it's out of your price range . It is time to start over. Although there is already a lot of searching for the city, directory and restaurant apps, many suffer from the same limits. No other option provides so many categories in a compact and easy to search package, so Poynt Corporation has intensified a free app that makes things a little rapidly. Poynt for Android scores points for convenience because consolidates more search functionality in a single app, automatically providing information based on the current position or any other position inserted. (Poynt is rapid to note that you only access this information on request, and you will never share it.) The App also provides lists of current fuel prices in nearby stations and a program of close events (such as concerts, festivals and games) That can synchronize with your Google calendar to remind you of the upcoming excitement. But this doesn't mean it's loaded with limits. Google Docs allows its users to work with text documents, presentations, images files and spreadsheets of spreadsheets. Document owners can grant different levels of authorization (such as modification, sharing or read-only) to employees and files can also be changed moving. One of the most interesting features is the possibility of taking a picture of any printed text document, and, when loaded, Google will convert the photo to a Google Docs file. The service is free, and how users of Gmail already know, storage limits are almost non-existent. In many cases where there is an overlap between a service and an app, it is difficult to say where it really ends and the other begins, raising the question if the app is actually necessary. If it is faster or easier to go directly to the source, the app is usually somehow useless, only existing so its developers can say that it is there. But Google has never been to the superfluous. It is true, the search engine could return with the value of a lifetime of connections, but Google services tend to be clean and elegant, basic without being navigated. And it makes sense that an app designed by Google for a Google service developed individually specifically to work on a Google property platform possess interpotomize everything that Google is for. So it is not surprising that PC World Magazine reports that the Google Docs Android Tablet app is worthy of note for its most well designed integration with the web-based Google Docs service [Source: Sirolmeyer].
