Sometimes it gives you a heart attack (not literally), and if you wear a Fitbit or some other fitness tracker at night, you can probably see on your heart rate graph when the alert went off. Luckily, Google does allow you to turn off AMBER alerts and other wireless emergency alerts. While it's not advised, as AMBER alerts are pretty important, it is possible. Google will allow you to turn off each type of alert too. As local and state governments can send out emergency alerts for weather and other things. So you can turn off AMBER alerts without losing the weather extreme alerts. Today, we'll show you how you can turn off AMBER alerts on your Android smartphone. What is an AMBER Alert? An AMBER alert (which stands for America's Missing: Broadcast Emergency Response), is typically used when children go missing. It was created in 1996, when Amber Hagerman was kidnapped in Arlington, Texas. Most localities will not issue an AMBER alert right away. It usually won't be issued for at least 24 hours. Since the alert does get sent to every cell phone in the area. Typically an AMBER alert will only give you the important information, like what is shown below: Amber Alert That includes the area, the time and the car of the suspect. Sometimes the license plate is shown in the AMBER alert, but that information is not always known. Typically, after an AMBER alert is issued, the child is found within a few hours. So it is very useful and does its job quite well. How to turn off AMBER alerts on your Android phone While the method to turn off AMBER alerts will differ by phone, the steps are usually basically the same. The method below is valid for the Google Pixel running on Android 12. Head to Settings. Scroll down to Notifications and tap on that. Now, scroll down to the bottom and choose Wireless emergency alerts. On this next screen, you'll see all of the different emergency alerts that you can turn on and off. AMBER Alerts will be the third option. Now, tap on the toggle next to AMBER Alerts to turn it off. And that's it. Now AMBER alerts won't go off on your phone. This can also be done for other emergency alerts on your phone. Like extreme threats, severe threats, public safety messages, state and local tests and you can see the emergency alert history here. Google will also provide an option to get the alerts in Spanish at the very bottom of the screen, which is rather neat. Amber Alert on Android (Image credit: Android Central) Every so often — or frequently, depending on your tolerance level — you get an emergency alert on your phone. That horrible blaring of the emergency tone, the buzzing the vibration motor, and then the grim news. Someone's missing. Or there's a severe weather alert headed your way. Suddenly and without warning, your phone's scaring the hell out of you. It's bad enough during the day, and downright dreadful in the dead of night. And that's the idea. The U.S. carriers have worked with the federal government to come up with a way to push alerts to your Android smartphone to warn you about dangerous weather, missing persons or other matters of grave national importance. The point is they want you to see this information in hopes that it could save your life — or someone else's. Here's what you need to know about these emergency alerts and how you can control them on your Android phone. What kind of emergency alerts are there? Source: Android Central (Image credit: Source: Android Central) There are three (or four, depending on how you're counting) types of emergency alerts you can receive on your Android. They're grouped into the less-dangerous-sounding "Cell Broadcast" heading, and include: Extreme threats: Classified as threats to your life and property, such as an impending catastrophic weather event like a hurricane, tornado or tsunami. Severe threats: Less serious than the extreme threats, these could be the same types of situations, but on a smaller scale — a reason to stay safe, but not evacuate or take extreme measures. AMBER alerts: These are specific alerts aimed at locating a missing child. Technically AMBER stands for "America's Missing: Broadcast Emergency Response." But it was named for Amber Hagerman, a 9-year-old who was kidnapped and killed in 1996. AMBER alerts will include as much information as the authorities currently have available, giving you the location of the alert, and often a vehicle description including a license plate number. Presidential alerts: These alerts will often fall into the "extreme threats" category, but are issued directly by the President of the United States (or through their office) and cannot be turned off in your phone's settings. It's loud and annoying — particularly if you have a phone with really good speakers. But it will really catch your attention if you're with several people who all have their phones out! You'll likely also find your phone is vibrating when an alert is issued, though some phones let you turn off vibration. How can I turn off emergency alerts on my Android? Source: Android Central (Image credit: Source: Android Central) Source: Android Central (Image credit: Source: Android Central) Though you don't have a choice as to whether you receive the presidential alerts, you can turn off the other types of alerts. We would recommend leaving them on, though, as the information could help you (or help you help someone else) in a time of danger. But if you want to familiarize yourself with the settings or tweak their parameters, there are options you can use. The settings will be found in a different place depending on what phone you have (yay, Android!) but the common theme is that the settings will be called "Cell Broadcasts" or "Emergency alerts." The best way to start looking for them is to open up your settings, and if you have a search function to simply type in "broadcasts" or "emergency" — chances are the phone will present you with the settings right away. If you don't have a search function, look under your sound, notification or display settings. On Samsung phones, emergency alert settings are found in the default Messages app. Go to the Messaging app's menu, settings, and then "Emergency alert settings" to configure the options. Depending on your phone, you'll be able to toggle each of the alerts independently, choose how they alert you and whether or not they vibrate when you receive one. Newer phones will even give you the option to turn on or off tests of the emergency alert system.
