If you look up this evening, there's a good chance you'll see September's full Harvest Moon rise into the dark sky, just two days before the fall equinox. To catch the moon at peak fullness, gaze upward after sunset at 7:55 p.m. EDT (11:55 p.m. GMT) on Monday (Sept. 20). If you miss that moment, don't worry: the moon will appear full until Wednesday morning (Sept. 22), the day of the autumn equinox in the Northern Hemisphere and the spring equinox in the Southern Hemisphere.The equinox, in fact, is what gives this moon its name. The full moon closest to the autumnal equinox is known as the Harvest Moon, a term first published in 1706, according to the Oxford English Dictionary, NASA reported. Historically, farmers worked late into the night when that full moon was in the sky, using its light to help them reap the fall harvest.Related: Photos: 2017 Great American Solar EclipseOther names for September's full moon include: the Fruit Moon, as a nod to fruits that are now ripening, including apples and grapes; and the Barley Moon, because the grain barley is harvested and threshed at this time. To the Algonquin tribes that live in North America, this is the Corn Moon, named for the crop staples of corn, pumpkins, beans and wild rice that grow this time of year, the Maine Farmers' Almanac reported in the 1930s, according to NASA.Meanwhile, in the Hebrew lunar calendar, this full moon falls near the beginning of Sukkot, a seven-day Jewish holiday during which observers build temporary huts outdoors, where they can eat, sleep and spend family time together. The holiday is in remembrance of the biblical stories of a harvest festival and a time when the Hebrews lived nomadically in the wilderness for 40 years. This year, Sukkot begins at sundown on Sept. 20 and lasts until sundown on Sept. 27.A photo of the nearly-full Harvest Moon, Jupiter and Saturn shining over New York City, taken from New Jersey on Sept. 19, 2021. (Image credit: Alexander Krivenyshev)In China, Vietnam and other countries in Asia, this moon is part of the Mid-Autumn Festival, also known as the Moon Festival and the Mooncake Festival. As part of their traditions, people give offerings to the moon goddess Chang'e, which is also the name that the China National Space Agency gave their lunar missions. In Korea, this full moon corresponds with Chuseok, a harvest festival in which Koreans leave the city to return to their traditional hometowns, where they can pay respect to their ancestors' spirits.For Hindus, this full moon signals the start of Pitru (or Pitru) Paksha, when they pay homage to their ancestors, usually through food offerings. For some Buddhists, it marks the beginning of Madhu Purnima, or the Honey Full Moon Festival, which is tied to a legend about Buddha settling a feud.On Wednesday, the whole world will experience the equinox, when the Northern and Southern Hemispheres see equal amounts of sunlight and nighttime. However, the equinox ("equal night" in Latin), doesn't account for twilight, so there may be longer daylight hours in some parts of the world, according to timeanddate.com. The equinox will happen at 3:20 p.m. EDT (19:20 GMT) on Sept. 22, when the sun's center passes the "celestial equator," an imaginary line pointing out from Earth's equator, according to The Old Farmer's Almanac.Originally published on Live Science. This evening, the moon will be at its best — in its full phase and at its closest point to Earth. If you have a camera ready, it's a prime opportunity to capture a brilliant lunar spectacle.Tonight's moon is the last of three back-to-back "supermoons" visible in the Northern Hemisphere this summer. It is known as the Harvest Moon since it is the full moon nearest the September equinox this year, according to Space.com.The moon will reach its full phase tonight at 9:38 p.m. EDT (0138 GMT). To celebrate tonight's supermoon — the last one until Sept. 28, 2015 — camera company Canon Inc., has released a few tips to make it easier for aspiring astrophotographers to get prime shots of Earth's closest celestial neighbor. [In Photos: Glitzy Images of a Supermoon]Here are some tips to keep in mind when photographing the moon:Keep your exposure settings similar to what you would input if you were taking pictures on a sunny day outside; the moon's surface is in full light because it's also illuminated by the sun.Use as long a focal length as you can for your lens. Somewhere in the range of 300 to 600 mm is acceptable for most amateur photographers.Although the moon will be bright enough for a short exposure, it's better to use a tripod to make sure the image is steady and that the shot is framed properly.There are other ways to improve your photographs of the moon. For instance, you can manually change the shutter speed (the exposure time), the aperture (the opening that controls how much light goes into the lens) and the ISO, or the sensitivity of the camera's photo cell, Jason Mrachina, a professional photographer based in Des Moines, Iowa, told Live Science in a previous story.Here are Mrachina's recommended settings:Tripod/ISO: 100 - 200Aperture: f11 - f14Shutter speed: 1/125 - 1/250Handheld/ISO: 300-1000Aperture: f8 - f9Shutter speed: 1/1000 - 1/1500Mrachina also recommended taking pictures from a dark area far from light pollution, and standing a short distance away from an object, such as a fence, that can create a silhouette in front of the moon.Follow Elizabeth Howell @howellspace, or Live Science on Twitter @livescience.
