WHY PEOPLE SHOULD STAY SAFE IN THE SUN

THESIS: Going out in the burning sun without sensible protection is extremely dangerous.

There are many reasons why you shoud stay safe from the burning sun. Some of them are you can get sunburnt, you can get skin cancers, and you can damage your eyesight.

ARGUMENT 1: The first reason is that you can get extremely sunburn. Sunburn is the skin's reaction to the ultraviolet (UV) radiation from the sun. You can see sunlight and feel heat (infrared radiation), but you can't see or feel UV radiation. It can damage your skin even on cool, cloudy days.

ARGUMENT 2: The second reason is that you can get horrible skin cancers because of damaging light rays. In Australia, over many people die from skin cancer because they do not stay safe in the burning sun. Although this can be cured, the prevention of getting burnt is a better solution than curing this skin cancer.

ARGUMENT 3: Another reason is that too much time out in bright sunlight can damage your eyesight. The intense ultraviolet (UV) rays of the sun damage sensitive cells in the eyes, eventually affecting vision. Experts say it is difficult to isolate the exact amount of damage that UV radiation imposes on the eye over a long period. However, a number of studies have shown that the effects build up and may increase the chance of developing eye problems later in life. These may include cataracts, a clouding of the lens of the eye.

RECOMMENDATION: The last, after knowing all dangers of the burning sun without sensible protection, I recommend you to wear a hat which can help your face, head, and hair stay safe in the sun. You should also put on a shirt which can protect you from many skin deseases, and you had better use sunscreen and wear sunglasses to prevent eye problems.

Smoking Public

A lot of people, especially teenagers, who do not smoke, always want to try smoking. They know it is bad for them and all, but it is just something they want to try. So they ask one of their smoker friends for a cigarette. Admittedly, they firstly can not light it on their own so they ask his friend to do it. Then they inhale that cigarette and smoke occasionally.

Apparently that makes them the born smokers. Now they do smoke fairly regularly. They can not avoid smoking and they enjoy too. They have smoker friends. Everyday they bring — a pack in their pocket. For them, a pack of cigarette is as important as a wallet for their money.

Suddenly, for certain reason, they realize the fact that tobacco is the cause of a long list of nasty diseases. It is not only heart disease, stroke, and chronic lung disease but also bladder, lung, and pancreatic cancer. Even it was reported that around 400,000 Americans died each year. It was one every 80 seconds from tobacco-related illnesses.

Then they decide it is stupid to harm selves. They want to quit smoking. Unfortunately, they find that quitting smoking is so difficult. "Why can't I stop smoking? I really want to stop it". It is hard to quit because nicotine is powerfully addictive. Cigarette is one of the most efficient drug-delivery devices ever devised. As result, when people try to quit smoking, they often experience classic nicotine withdrawal symptoms such as anxiety, irritability, headache, Recommendation — Well, still want to try smoke? Think the facts before trying! If you are not smoker, you should never and never try to smoke.

that accredits and certifies nearly 21,000 U.S. healthcare organizations and programs, has had a change of heart about the use of texting patient orders. In 2011, the organization banned the transmission of HIPAA protected health information (PHI) via text message by personal mobile devices. Specifically, physicians and licensed independent practitioners (LIP) were not allowed to text any orders regarding care, services or treatment to hospitals or other kinds of healthcare facilities. This decision was handed down because it was believed that the technological capabilities were insufficient to support the safety and security of information contained in text messages of patient care orders. Then, in May 2016, The Joint Commission lifted the ban after determining that there had been sufficient technological advances in security and safety to support the secure texting of orders. As long as healthcare practitioners followed certain professional standards and guidelines, laws and regulations, and policies and procedures, patient care orders could be sent on a secure text messaging system. But the rollout of this new policy hit a snag and was halted in the following month. Even though patient orders were to be sent on secure text messaging systems, concerns still lingered that there needed to be further security measures implemented for texting orders. The Joint Commission was working in collaboration with the Centers for Medicare and Medicaid Services to ensure that the ruling was congruent with Medicare's conditions of participation. While healthcare providers waited for clarification, in December 2016, The Joint Commission along with the Centers for Medicare and Medicaid Services decided that the previous ruling should be rolled back to 2011 standards. Specifically, this means the following: What's known as computerized provider order entry (CPOE) is now the preferred method for order submission, so providers can enter orders into electronic health records (EHR) directly. CPOE has become more and more available via encrypted, secure applications for both smartphones and tablets. The Joint Commission believes that this would reduce the burden of the implementation of this policy. If a CPOE or a patient care order cannot be electronically submitted, a verbal order may be used, but only as a last resort. Verbal orders should not be used as a shortcut by the ordering healthcare practitioner. In the past few years, generally speaking, the technology for secured text messaging has advanced, where messages are encrypted end-on-end. With that in mind, it's unclear as to why The Joint Commission and the Centers for Medicaid Services jointly decided to indefinitely end the use of securely texting patient orders. However, they did find at least three issues in their review of this policy. 1. A possible increase in workload for nurses. The implementation of an additional routine — the manual transcription of text orders allow for real-time clarification. This is related to the first issue, the added step of transcribing texts. The benefit of adding secure text messages may be washed out by the task of transcribing the message. If there's a typo or a question about the text, then additional time is added when the ordering practitioner is contacted for further clarification. 3. Clinical decision support recommendations/alerts may take additional time. Like the second issue, a clinical decision support recommendation or alert may be made, and whoever is entering the information into the electronic health record may need to consult with the ordering practitioner for more information. If this is given verbally, then the information can be handled in real time. On the other hand, if this is given via text message, then the transcriber must contact the ordering practitioner. These additional steps may delay treatment. Although these are some compelling reasons given — increased workload, decreased clarity and delayed treatment — mobile devices are becoming more and more a part of professional life, and not just as a means to electronically transmit patient health information into electronic health records. With this indefinite ban of secure text messaging for orders that was just recently implemented by The Joint Commission, I would love for healthcare sector leaders to look around and think about how we can provide a positive experience using technology. That is the digital world that we live in. "The biggest problem is that you can't interpret emotion over a text message," says Carrie McDermott, co-founder of HeTexted.com, a site where women can post confusing texts from men. In other words, you might be thinking, "Totally nailed that convo!" while she's feverishly forwarding your message to her gal pals. Here's how to avoid ending up on McDermott's website—or worse, in the doghouse. 2 of 6 Text from Hell #1: "Hey ..." You think you're being flirty and suggestive, but this screams "lazy" to her. "You should never send a 'nothing' text—which is really just a text that demands the person receiving it does all the work," says Michael Fiore, founder of textyourexback.com. Checking in via text is fine—as long as you make your intentions clear. You're one hell of a snow bunny :)" No extended conversation necessary. 3 of 6 Text from Hell #2: "©" We get it: Emoticons are fun and a little bit ironic. But if a woman takes a risk and says, "I had a great time tonight," a smiley face is just going to shut her down—not confirm that you agree, says McDermott. Same goes for "K", "Haha, nice!" or "LOL!"—which really don't count as responses at all. "We're not asking for a novel here," McDermott says. "Just give us a full sentence." If she says she had fun, simply reply, "I had a really great time, too. Thanks for coming out with me." Or if she forwards you a funny link, fire off a text that shows you actually read it, like, "That's hilarious! Totally on point." 4 of 6 Text from Hell #3: "What do you wanna do tonight?" This is fine if you're 5 years into a relationship. But in the early stages, you need to take charge—or at least offer a suggestion or two, "Women want a guy who will invite them on an adventure, not a guy who will invite them on an adventure, not a guy who's waiting around for them to make a decision," says Fiore, Even a simple "Italian or Mexican?" will suffice, 5 of 6 Text from Hell #4: "I was pretty drunk last night ..." Sending this gem the morning after a hookup is the fastest way to mortify a woman. "No girl wants to see the words, 'I don't remember much,' " says McDermott. "It usually means the guy remembers everything and he's embarrassed about it. And no woman is going to say, 'Oh, let me give you an update. You said you liked me.'" If you truly regret what happened, that's a conversation best had face-to-face—or at the very least, over the phone. 6 of 6 Text from Hell #5: "Going out with the guys. See you tomorrow." This should score you points—you are, after all, communicating your plans. But unfortunately, the tone of this text does you in. "This says, 'The guys are more important to me than you are, and you won't be hearing from me tonight, " says Fiore. The key: Make her feel special when clueing her in. For example, you might say, "Hey, I'm going out with the guys tonight, but I'll be thinking about her, and also has something to look forward to," says Fiore. 6 Guys Who Aced Their Proposals Advertisement - Continue Reading Below
